NEWS: Scientists gather to decode puzzle of world's rarest whale

WHAT'S IN THE NEWS?

The spade-toothed whale, the world's rarest whale species, was recently studied for the first time after a male specimen washed ashore in New Zealand. This elusive marine mammal, sacred to the Maori iwi, highlights New Zealand's status as a whale-stranding hotspot.

Spade-Toothed Whale and Its Study

- Rarest Whale Species: Only seven specimens documented; part of the beaked whale family (Ziphiidae).
- Recent Discovery: A 5-meter-long male washed ashore in New Zealand in July 2024; first detailed dissection conducted.
- Distinct Features: Named for its unique spade-like teeth; habitat includes the Southern Pacific Ocean.
- Conservation Status: Data Deficient (IUCN); listed under CITES Appendix II.
- Scientific Name: Mesoplodon traversii; discovered in Pitt Island, New Zealand (1872).
- Cetacean Overview: Infraorder of aquatic mammals including whales, dolphins, and porpoises under order Artiodactyla.
- Cultural Significance: Sacred (taonga) to New Zealand's Maori iwi; Pacific Indigenous leaders recognize whales as "legal persons."

New Zealand as a Whale-Stranding Hotspot

- History: Over 5,000 strandings since 1840.
- Significant Finds: Spade-toothed whale bones from Pitt Island (1872) and Robinson Crusoe Island (1986).
- Recent Specimen: Marks from cookie-cutter sharks observed but not the cause of death.

Maori Iwi (Tribes)

- Indigenous tribes of New Zealand with a rich cultural heritage.
- Guardians (Kaitiaki) of natural resources, with deep connections to whales and nature.
